

The fear that you seek is a form of coping and comfort when you want to hide and run from what really scares you. You use the fear that you can find outside yourself to avoid confronting the fear that you cower from internally. Afraid of the things you aren't used to; being deeply perceived and seen, independence and the future you can't seem to envision anymore. You use ghosts and demons to distract from the skeletons you have laying in your closet.

You drown yourself in disposable content, light and easy to digest, to avoid having to go up to the surface where the air is a toxic cloud of pain and regret . You can't see through the fog and it's easier to breathe in the water. It's safer. You can't see through the clouds, but you know what lies on the other side. Cold and dark. You told yourself you'll forget about it.. You know what's waiting at the surface but you don't wanna see it again. You evade and swim deeper and deeper hoping to lose your way from the surface. Pretending the surface does not exist, that it isn't real. You've grown used to the coral. There's an imprint of yourself among them, and you've already acquainted yourself with the fish anyway. The sharks are your friends. The rocks are your cushion when you push yourself deeper down because far isn't far enough to hide.