

“I'll just lay in bed”, I said,
Slowly entranced by a certain kind of existential dread.
I bet I'll never forget the foggy mess roaming my head
The fog that grows everytime I close my eyes
When I try to fan it away
It only grows wings and flies
Away for a moment but always returns
On a mission to send me somewhere
Dark and void of a single soul
Hollow and desolate
Where clear sight is like walking over blades to find
Far down the road of unexplainable
Where a dead end only grows farther and farther
To the point of feeling stationary in place
Hopeless and bare to them
The thoughts that endlessly lurk, relentlessly linger
Always seem to leave me irked, and I can't seem to put my finger
On what it exactly is or could be
This intangible feeling, like a being of its own
With fantasies it makes An intoxicating scene, a perfect nightmare, one that I can never seem to shake