

THE INEVITABLE

Aimen Shahid

“Ay shallow minds, Frostmoor belongs to me now!” glowered the ginger haired lady with lustrous tiara gleaming in murky shadows of night. Cries of pain and shouts from onlookers overwhelmed the aura. Kenina, the empress of the town, exchanged furtive glances with the crowd and let her lissome figure flit about the chairs.

“Tomorrow, is the day which every soldier seeks.” she says, “It is the time to take revenge from Seastones of killing our innocent people.”

Myriads of folks geared up with ambition burning their souls and tracing their deaths. The next day, watching the sun rise from its horizon, thousands of soldiers packed in bulky metal cases continued to march towards the battlefield. Among them was the highness, Kenina, grabbing waxed swords, fastened the reins of her horse.

The clanking of swords and the hissing of arrows engulfed the field, however, the victory never showed up; Frostmoor were being defeated as hundreds of ashen heads got parched from the body. Vultures had been feeding on corpses that had been coated with dry blood. Naked abdomens and amputated limbs scattered miles and miles away. The stench slithered around the atmosphere with sun casting its murky shadows upon the crusts of earth. Flares of ash and burnt bodies piled up in heaps amidst the cloudless sky. Seastones, the kingdom known for their revolt, stole breaths from everyone except for Kenina who was still not accepting death.

“I am afraid to give up! O you inevitable piece of maggot! Don’t dare to approach me!” whispered Kenina’s gauche soul.

The sweat lingered with passion, thin caresses adjourned her velvety veins and overcharged it with a brief awe. Guts arose in the spooky shadows of vintage that slackened its agony, begging to quench a few sips of blood. The divinity of seven skies sparked its wrath upon the silently perches guilt, continuously proclaiming,

“It’s too early! By God! This was not the time for this!”

“Time for what?” the ancestors worried and halted as the sinister silence replied,

“DEATH. It has come. It had to come.”

The ambience rebuked the depths of irony- half drenched in the throes of cessation. With a pair of finely sharpened daggers, the unearthly shrieks scraped the mushy soul.

Alas, the fifty-fourth attack confined with its age and haunted the hollow whimpers due to the serendipity of sky and casted its last curse that caused the undefined. She could not prevent the flames of acrimony tickle and mock her heels. Helpless. Destitute. Desperate. The air filled with ruthless commitments invoking the callous disregards. Flickers of thrill sprung at her rusty bones that wove the tapestry of brutal saga.

Perhaps, the twelfth hour had approached. The final plunging of dagger, penetrating her once-mighty rule, blew the scarlet droplets of gore that had ever since reigned the disgracing lusts.

The breaths chuckled and quite lasted with a few words urging the merciless death,

“You change places with me; no one will ever know.”

With a forceful stab, the game ended. The sins had not been forgiven ever since.