

I know what's best for you. I have been with you for as long as we can remember and I have been protecting you since the dawn of time. I live in your mind filtering out the waste that poisons your thoughts like venom from a serpent green of envy. I erase your sanity and bring you bliss when you need it. I hide you from the dark and keep you in the light where nothing can touch you to taint you. You're precious. If I can't take you away from all that could harm you, what would I be? I am your delusions that block you from the harsh winds of the voices that attempt to force you to face it. Face away, focus on me and nothing else. You're safe with me. I am your delusions that keep you from reality.

Delusions only ever harm you from what you should face, what you should confront and devour. Avoidance will only push you further into the pits of despair you rip your nails off of trying to climb up out of. It might hurt but you need to build your own stairs and pull yourself up. Make it easier for yourself and stop hiding. I am the reason you made it so far. I am the gravity that keeps you grounded and keeps you from flying too high. That brings you down to earth where you should be. Where your life lies. I am the voices that bring you back.

I know it's easier, I understand, but you can only heal from a stab wound if you remove the knife even if you've already grown used to the knife and made it part of you. It isn't. It'll only infect you and hurt you worse and for longer. Your delusions are countless blades of glass trying to reflect the pain away from you but they always get deeper. The winds of reality push them deeper. Hurt you more. Face them. The glass reflects the light it tries to keep you safe in, shadowing you in the dark you run from. The delusions are lies. They are poisonous. They suffocate you.

I hold you dearly and tightly, I won't let go. I can't imagine living letting you down. Letting you hurt. When you fall and spiral I catch you in warmth and fuzz. I am your safety blanket. I make you the world that you long for and can't have. I give it all to you. I need you, you keep me going. I can't stop. Not now, not ever.

You fail as a safety blanket and instead of being comfort, you are pain, you smother. You burn. You destroy. You are what you aim to reflect. You are glass shards, not shields. You kill with your misdirected and untreated affections. You're not a soft landing from a fall. You are a spiderweb. You trap and consume. You only mean well but well isn't enough. You love and protect but not in any way that would lead to anything other than more pain. You need to release and let them face the dark and learn how to make light themselves.