Allow your fingertips to brush the edge of paper
And curl the sheet completely over
Let your eyes absorb the ink blots that our brain
Processes as words on a blanket page
And continue reading

Some books you must pry open
And they dry the sheet above your iris often
Others cordially collapse wide in your palms
And it feels they barely consumed your time at all
But continue reading

The plots I briefly skim or fall deep into Stain the mundane one I live through
Even yellowed 200 year old fables
Clutter my nightstand table
So I continue reading

A convicted man finds a secret treasure
While boys in a forest eat each other
Resentful animals uproar in a corrupted farm
And soldiers in war link arm to arm
While I continue reading

Barring a child from reading
Is similar to one prevented from eating
For a child cracking open a fresh spine
Can resculpture flesh in their mind
So let them continue reading
