

NIGHT STORIES

Aimen Shahid

“TA-DA! bookworm, what is this piece of junk?” goaded my dart-eyed sister grabbing my diaries- as old as time- and invoking her odium for them. However, giving it no gleam, I continued to write stories with impetus passion. Hours and hours, I would sit perched against the chair, thinking for plots that combine twists with pinnacles. Ideas would terribly ambush in my mind; perhaps, the only paroxysm of emotion I could witness.

Satisfaction and contentment, I felt when grasped my pen and traced figures on a paper confining my thoughts. Alas, no one bothered what I liked. Everyone would never appreciate what I wrote; rather, they would slam shut the door while leaving my room. I felt hurt, broken inside with hollow cramps whimpering day and night. The next day, I woke up sizing the alarm, and screwed up in aureate smock, I approached the cafe.

Within no time, my friend arrived. Reuniting after a long holiday made us spend five hours of day talking. Suddenly, I felt a girl sitting behind us record our talks as the flashlight flickered in my eye. We were aware that someone might overhear our conversation so we left the café. Thus, what we were afraid off just happened as the girl in cafe accused me of stealing all the lost school items. Cluster of stares pierced through my soul in the school and embarrassment upraised dreadfully. Vexedly, the principle snarled,

“If this is so, Aimen might have to look for another school!!!”

Weeping silent tears and choked sobs with broken voice and gasping for some air, I left the place and unknowingly ran towards the woods next to our school. Realizing my muscles shrink slowly, I stopped to a violent jerk, amidst the wild forest flushing with russet and gold. Vistas of sylvan charm slackened my agony. Soon, the forest was dappled with pale moonlight giving me a sign to return home, afraid of encountering my parents.

Perhaps, as I reached home, stepped up the stairs, I saw my parents sitting and watching tv. Their ashen faces let the awe engulf my numb skin. As they peeked at me, my mother asked me,

“No need for being sad. Maliha has spluttered her accusation just wrong.”

With a sigh of relief, I embraced her slender figure with tears of joy rolling down softly.