

Ode to Driving

Momma told me to drive myself
to school
today,
in the rain,
pouring down
like a baby's tears,
gently
like a lullaby,
until
released from its cage,
water roared
like a lion,
free at last.
The windshield wipers
broke,
like a heart
or a
rule.
Like a bat,
I couldn't see
the emerald lights
nor the
geometric
rays
painting the road.
Driving,
a four-mile
haunted house,
a dark
alleyway
nowhere,
a vengeful spirit
dressed in
black,
spiders,
snakes,
clowns,
monsters,
tests.
Honks blare

in my ears,
like a
Monday
fire drill.
I turn to see the culprit
is in my
carrier D
Spanish class,
now flashing
a smile
made of pearls and
Ivory.

But I am here,
made it
all the way
to class.
So,
never fear
the baby's tear
or the moving
machine monster,
or anything else.
