

The Fog

The ringing from the call soon blurred into the ringing of the gunshot. The sound that would stay with me as I would cross the eternal plane, watching myself collapse and leave my own body. “What do I do now?” I thought to myself as I roamed through the nothingness of death. No clue where I'm supposed to go, mindless and bodiless. Lost but found as I finally see silhouettes in the distance hidden among the bright fog. “Is this where we go? Is this what I died for?” As the silhouette spread and grew in the distance, a wave of relief grew over me. Feeling less alone, less cold. Watching the silhouettes prance and pass in and out of my visual frame, wandering as if they had places to be or as if they still had life to tend to. It was surreal to witness such an ironic scene of the dead being full of life more than I've seen living..